Introducing a New Series from Ashgate...

Gender in Law, Culture, and Society

Series Editor: Martha Albertson Fineman, Emory University

Ashgate Publishing Company is soliciting manuscripts for a new book series entitled Gender in Law, Culture, and Society, edited by Martha Albertson Fineman of Emory University.

Gender in Law, Culture, and Society will address key issues and theoretical debates related to gender, culture and the law. Its titles will advance understanding of the ways in which a society’s cultural and legal approaches to gender intersect, clash, and are reconciled or remain in tension. The series will further examine connections between gender and economic and political systems, as well as various other cultural and societal influences on gender construction and presentation, including social and legal consequences that men and women uniquely or differently encounter. Intended for a scholarly readership as well as for courses, its titles will be a mix of single-authored volumes and collections of original essays that will be both pragmatic and theoretical. It will draw from the perspectives of critical and feminist legal theory, as well as other schools of jurisprudence. Interdisciplinary and international in scope, the series will offer a range of voices speaking to significant questions arising from the study of law in relation to gender, including the very nature of law itself.
